Dubbed a Renaissance man by the Harvard Business Review, Anand Mahindra is vice chairman and managing director of Mahindra & Mahindra Ltd. (M&M), a Mumbai-based 'confederation' of almost 100 companies with revenues of $6.6 billion and 60,000 employees. A film major at Harvard College, Mahindra has won rave reviews for his efforts to restructure and diversify the giant family firm and turn it into a global enterprise.

How do you see the role of business now and in the future?

Consumers are demanding a new template for corporations. They are not satisfied with glossy reports on sustainability and corporate philanthropy; they want CEOs and business leaders who will walk the talk on environmental harmony and social responsibility.

What do you think about the future relationship between India and China?

There is a grudging acknowledgment on both sides that we stand to lose far too much if we are goaded into an adversarial relationship. Combining our strengths will be profitable, both politically and economically.

What's the toughest thing you've had to do in your job?

When I first joined M&M Ltd., I had to dismiss some very senior executives who had clearly been violating the ethical values of the group. It was the most agonizing and stressful period in my career thus far.

What are your thoughts on the future of global business?

The current global slowdown will change the nature of business in lasting ways. First, we'll be driven to create technologies and operations that are resistant to spikes in fossil fuel prices. Second, despite an initial flurry of protectionism and inward-looking politics, it will become clear that the best way to lessen the severity of worldwide recessions is to increase the volume of interdependent trade among nations.

Which of M&M's products are you most proud of?

Our design of the Scorpio hybrid, India's first indigenous hybrid vehicle. We hope to have it available in U.S. showrooms before long!

What keeps you up at night?

Oil at well over $100 per gallon and customers who don't believe we've delivered on our product or service promises.

How do you find time for your family?

My wife, Anuradha, is uncompromising when it comes to my giving priority to family and friends. Thanks to her coaching, I've learned how to switch off my 'crackberry' and how to say no to requests for meetings.

How do you relax?

Not surprisingly, I enjoy movies, and I use the wondrous invention of home DVD to catch up on world cinema.

I collect antique maps of India from the days of the British Raj and am also finding time to indulge in still photography and play the occasional game of tennis.

What's your favourite place to vacation or visit?

A coffee plantation in the southern Indian district of Coorg, which was established by my parents in the sixties and is now run by my sister.
